Continuing my Aesop project, I recently picked up a copy of Milo Winter's classic collection, originally published in 1919. With 146 fables, and at least one color illustration per page, The Aesop for Children has long been the edition against which all others are judged. Part of the so-called "golden age" of children's illustration, Winter worked on many children's classics in the early years of the twentieth century, but it is primarily this book for which he is remembered.

Aesop's fables are as fresh today as they have ever been. We have all heard of the hare and the tortoise and the boy who cried wolf - and children still love these short stories with their simple morals. Milo Winter provided beautiful illustrations for these tales, in a book first published in 1919 - reproduced fully in black and white for this new edition.

Most children five years old and up can understand perfectly the story line and the few words that they may not be familiar with gives the adult a golden opportunity to do a bit of teaching, which after all is one of our important responsibilities. But let's be perfectly honest here. The title of this work is The Aesop for Children.
